Indonesia, the world's largest archipelago, is not only known for its beautiful landscapes and rich culture, but also for its agricultural sector. Agriculture is crucial for the country's economy, providing jobs for a significant portion of the population and helping with both local needs and exports.

The sector is marked by its diversity, encompassing a wide range of tropical commodities, from staple crops to high-value products like palm oil, natural rubber, cocoa, herbs, spices and coffee.

Indonesia's agriculture significantly impacts the world by supporting global food security, markets, and sustainability efforts. As a major player in tropical products, Indonesia's role will continue to expand, emphasizing the need to balance economic growth with environmental care and responsible sourcing.
